Signature Talks

I Rebuilt My Company Around an AI Agent — What Actually Works

The unvarnished story behind the headlines: rebuilding a live SaaS platform around an AI agent that now handles support, code review, operations, and finance. What broke, what surprised us, the muffler incident, and the guardrails that make it safe. For business audiences deciding what AI should — and shouldn't — run.

AI for the Rest of Us: Small Teams, Real Guardrails

Most AI advice is written for enterprises with AI teams. This is the playbook for everyone else: how a lean company identifies where AI genuinely fits, starts small without betting the business, and builds trust in automation one boring task at a time. Practical, tool-agnostic, immediately usable.

ADHD, AI, and the Art of Staying Out of Your Own Way

Josh told a newspaper his AI journey started with, in his words, asking the AI to keep him away from himself. This talk is the full story: designing systems around how your brain actually works, productivity without shame, and why the future of work might fit neurodivergent minds better than the past ever did.

About Josh

Josh Driver is the founder and CEO of Selflessly, a workplace giving and volunteering platform built on a simple conviction: doing good at work should be easy, and as much as possible should reach the causes people care about — not platform fees. Since launching in 2020, Selflessly has moved millions of dollars in time, talent, and treasure to nonprofits across the globe. In 2026 Josh rebuilt the platform around "Phil," an AI agent woven through the product and the company itself — a story covered by the Indianapolis Business Journal. He speaks with candor and humor about AI, entrepreneurship, corporate philanthropy, and building a company that fits the founder's actual brain. Audiences leave with things they can do Monday morning.
